With Erwin Wurm (b. 1954), the MAK is inviting one of the internationally most significant artists of the present age into the MAK Branch Geymüllerschloß. Under the title Dissolution, Wurm is for the first time presenting in a dramaturgical arrangement sculptures from his series of the same name (2018–2020) in a museum context. Wurm has formed plastic masses of clay into gesturing hands, mouths, ears, or other fragments of body parts associated with the senses of touch, hearing, smell, and taste.

The word “dissolution” has connotations of disintegration, decay, decomposition, and vanishing boundaries. With his series of the same name, Erwin Wurm opens up a dialogue between a fragile, sociopolitically connotated material; contemporary sculptural language; and a reinterpretation of the painterly through oscillating ceramic glazes. The sculptures—with their protruding fingers, hands, lips, mouths, breasts, bellies, navels, noses, and ears—force their way out of a clayey mass. These surreal experimental structures composed of isolated body parts and sense organs take on a life of their own; their bulkiness generates an expressive presence.

The ceramic sculptures affirm the inherently plastic nature of the material clay. They recall the potency of bozzetti, in which artists since the Renaissance have been able give direct expression to their innermost creative ideas. Bozzetti were preliminary sketches, the draft models of works to be executed in more challenging materials. Painters use bozzetti, three-dimensional models in clay or plaster, to study the incidence of light and shadow in their paintings, placing them on miniature stages. Sculptors themselves drafted their stone and ceramics works in the form of clay bozzetti. Bozzetti reveal the artist’s conception of the work—the “idea” behind it—and represent the autonomization of the artist’s creativity.

Erwin Wurm’s sculptural body segments invade the individual rooms and salons of the Geymüllerschloß—the entrance hall, the library, the music room, the cupola room, the bedroom, the oriental room—creating tableaux vivants. The works, reminiscent of abstract characters, mirror deconstructions, deformations, distortions, contortions, dissolution and decay. In his sculptural forms the artist combines realism with abstraction. The multifaceted gestures of an imaginary role play await the visitor, in which these abstract, sculptural forms assume figurative, human traits.

In his oeuvre Erwin Wurm brings together disparate genres, surprising us by intermeshing painterly gesture, sculpture, concept art, performance, and narrative. At the same time, he exaggerates the functionality and symbolism of objects, testing the conceptual boundaries of sculptural form and its materials. Dust, used by Wurm as raw material, alludes to the momentariness of time. Clothes, a second skin or casing, he declares to be sculptural bodies whose proportions he extends or distorts. Wurm redefines the function of furniture, forming the stage props of our surreal world's consumer culture—cars, houses, samples of Austrian culinary culture—into sculptures.

In the garden of the Schlössel, Erwin Wurm's massive sculptures of Carrara marble, resembling divans, virtually invite the visitor to take a seat. The staved in and squashed sculptures Sitting on Freud's House (2020) and Sitting on Friedrich Nietzsche (2020) in the villa garden represent the broad spectrum of the artist's role in critically illuminating and distorting our world.

The exhibition ERWIN WURM: Dissolution also marks the start of the Geymüllerschloß season, that runs from 8 May to 5 December 2021.
